Taking the problem of environmental funding to the community – an innovative approach

The Friends of Scott Creek Conservation Park are a thriving volunteer group with a 26-year history of contribution to conserving remnant vegetation in one of the largest intact areas of native vegetation in the Mount Lofty Ranges region.

With the loss of some large environmental grant schemes the group put their heads together to come up with a way of securing funding that was independent of government grants and budgets and to truly become a community project and the Almada Project was born.

So far the project has been successful at leveraging over $45,000 through a variety of funding sources and activities.

If your group is looking for ways to maintain or boost its activities and membership in the face of diminishing funding and support, then this presentation is a must see.
